

Horse Camping and Day Use Sites – Central and Northern California

A Disclaimer! The information contained in this document is considered accurate and reliable as of the date of print. I make no claims to its absolute accuracy. I advise any potential user to contact the camp or day use site directly for up-to-date detail, or the regional contact if there is no direct line, for information available at that time. Further, while I have attempted to include most relevant data, I do not assume I have included it all. Research of this type is endless; dependent on continuous and reliable feedback from the various sources and end users alike. Truly, it never ends, especially in these times of park closures, etc.

Notes:

Thank you to all who have worked with me and provided information, data and connections often not readily available.

Reservations: Many parks, including California State Parks and the East Bay Regional Park District, require reservations through Reserve America. Go to www.reserveamerica.com and follow the links. Reserve America's website also provides phone numbers if you require assistance. Other parks allow reservations by phone and if not with Reserve America, the websites provide a link. If all else fails, Google or Bing the park name. You will find a link.

Fees: Most parks and camps charge fees, especially for group activities. Be sure to ask about day use and camp (extended stay) fees and required permits, if any. Permits are normally required for group camps.

Reminders: Other reminders and inquiries that need attention when planning a trip:

- trail closures
- trail restrictions
- maximum capacity
- rest room and shower facilities
- potable water
- corrals
- are trails shared
- community bbq and/or kitchen/galley area available?
- power

.....because there is no way to provide all the detail here.

Timing: Plan ahead. Allow plenty of time as most reservations must be made months ahead of time.

Camp Fires: In most parks where camp fires are allowed, you must bring your own firewood. Some parks sell firewood but it is rather expensive. Inquire before lighting up!

Camp Hosts: Many parks have camp hosts. Ask if your park has a camp host. Get the name(s) and introduce yourself.

Websites: Visit the websites for more information and details.

California State Parks: www.parks.ca.gov
National Park Service: www.nps.gov
U. S. Forestry Service: www.fs.fed.us
East Bay Regional Parks: www.ebparks.org/parks

This list will always be work in progress and by no means complete. Send your advice regarding other parks that should be included and additional information addressing any park allowing horses.
